The Social Significance of the “New Economy”

The new economy is more than simply a shift to new technology in the workplace. It has changed the way Canadians work, transforming work structures and work processes.

A Better Shared Understanding

Restructuring Work and Labour in the New Economy seeks to determine under what conditions economic changes are socially progressive or socially regressive. It gathers and shares new knowledge in order to improve the quality and conditions of work and community life throughout the country. A new vision for the future.

The Cost of Not Acting

By not exploring how the new economy has changed the nature of work in Canada, trade unions, community organizations, researchers and decision-makers in government and business will be at a serious disadvantage when it comes to breaking down barriers that impede the quality and conditions of work and community life throughout the country.
