Looking at Impact from Every Angle

The emerging “one world” marketplace means good business for some. But what does it mean for individuals, cultures and the environment? Lawyers, sociologists, geographers and artists are asking about representation and institutional change in a globalizing world.

A Better Shared Understanding

Globalization is not just an economic process, but a process of the world becoming increasingly interconnected. In researching Law, Political Economy & Global Cities, a transnational network of scholars and artists is exploring institutional change, societal self-regulation, and the transformation of governments in global cities. Their interdisciplinary perspective provides an essential contribution to ongoing research into innovation and sustainability.

The Cost of Not Acting

A comprehensive and interdisciplinary exploration of the legal, economic, cultural, and environmental implications of disembedded markets is critical. Without this understanding, globalization will further lead to relentless privatization, human exploitation, exclusion and ecological destruction.

Real-World Solutions to Real-World Challenges

Real-world challenges demand different angles, different approaches, and different attitudes. Interdisciplinary and collaborative, York University research delivers relevant insights and meaningful solutions that address today’s complex social issues.

www.research.yorku.ca